THE YENGEANCE OF CARMELITA.

A Mexican Tale of the "Cave of the Dead."

Far up in a rocky defile in the Everlasting Slerras of the land of the Montezumas, and overlooking a valley—the Valley of the Angels—reas the hacienda of the Mines of the Holy Children, so named by the Jesuits for back in the dead past. A row of low, straggling adobe buildings reaches up the canon from the mill to a liny plaza—a plaza containing a few stunted orange trees, a stone bench or two and a broken fountain that never flows. Near the plaza stands a rude little chapel, so disapidated in appearance that only a wooden cross inshed with rawhile and leaning from the roof, and a cracked and clapperless bell hanging by the door, distinguish it from its surfoundings as a house of God.

There is a house roofed with rough, red tiles terraced up on the mountain side, above the church, and out in its wide portice one summer afternoon, a young man rested in a hammoek, carelessly swaying nimself to and fro as his thoughts drifted back into the past. Near by, a girl—one of those creatures of the South through whose reins courses that Latin-Indian blood that turns to flame at a glane—stood gently couring water from an earthenware jug nite an oila that hung suspended from the oof. Her dress was simple—some loose, white garment, exposing her arms and houlders, with a skirt of red material that ell only to a little below her nees. Great waves of dark hair oil unconfined down over her shoulders, find her eyes, black and brilliant, rested on we man as she murmured: "Vida de milma—mio amo!"

The flor, She stood leaning account.

fell unconfined down over her shoulders, and her eyes, black and brilliant, rested on the man as she murmured: "Vida de mi alma—mlo amor!"

The firl had emptied her jug and placed it on the floor. She stood leaning arainst the doorway, slowly braiding her hair, and the man, turning suddenly in his hammack, exclaimed: "Ah! little one—Carmelita mila—come here."

"Si senor," she answered as she moved toward him, "What is the senor's wish."

As she reached his side, he threw his arm around her, and drawing her face down to his, pressed a kiss to her lips.

Like a flash she tore herself from him and stood trembling out of his reach, a flame of angry protest darting from the depths of her eyes as she cried, "Caramba! What would you, diablo!" Then she struck him with her clenched hand, and bursting into tears, passed into the house.

"The devil!" exclaimed the man. "Well somehow, her lips scemed to say, Drink me, and I had to kiss her, even if she is only my housekeeper's daughter." The stretching back in his hammock, Maurice Stanton, superintendent of the Mines of the Holy Children, made himself comfortable for his siesta.

As the days sped by, he made his peace with Carmellta, and after awhile they would sit out on the portico during the evening, talking, or would wander up the cannot to a shrine, where a rude figure of the Madonna, with the Blessed Itabe in he arms, had been carved in the rock by hands crumbled to dust long years ago. There was a little spring there, too, and a stone seat beside it, and there, one evening, he passed his arm gently around her and drew her to him. She did not resist.

"Kiss me, Carmelita cara," he whispered: "kiss me," and as she compiled, he felt her tremble in his arms. He released her, and she dashed from him down the trail, and—he knew that he had won her.

It was during the following month that Senor Don Jose Sandoval, owner of the Mines of the Holy Children, arrived from the City of Mexico on his semi-annual visit of inspection. Accompanying him were two ladies, his sister, the

why. Carmellia," he said, "you have been crying."

"Yes, senor—a little," she replied.
"But why, dear? Not for me?"

She cast her eyes down, and with a sigh modded her head, and then burst into tears.

It was a senor to a seat on the bench, and, pressing her trembling form close to him, kissed her. "Carmellia, darling," he murmurd, "stop crying and tell me what it is."

After awhile she ceased, and, freeing herself from his arms, turned to him and caught his face firmly between her hands. Gazing her tears, she panted: "You love me, no?—me?—me? Ploss de mi aima! You love me?—not her! Is it not so? She is "Manothing to you, no? You danced with her do-night, one—two—so many times. She shall not have you! You are mine, mine! Do you hear?"

The heard, realized the intensity of her passion; yet he drew her back to his arms, and there, with her head pillowed on his shoulder, he told her of that old, old story. The heard that he had a should had not know, neither did he care. He liked not know, neither did he care. He liked the charm of that old, old story, and she—believed.

Whither he himself was drifting he did not know, neither did he care. He liked the charm of that old, old story, and she—believed.

Whither he himself was drifting he did not know, neither did he care. He liked the charm of that old, old story, and she—believed, while with her, a vision of a girl with masses of reddish brown hair would the end be?—for end if must, and he should had a should have a sake year while with her, a vision of a girl with masses of reddish brown hair would come to him, and had had he affect on with the tide of her passid stanton was coming up from the mill, where he had been detained until late, he met Guadalure as she came from the mill, where he had been detained until late, he met Guadalure as she came from the mill, where he had been detained until late, he met Guadalure as he came to her, for she head hack, raising her face to his. alupe, darling, I am Maurice. Come to me, dear,"

She walked toward him, and standing there with her hands clasped across her breast, looked up into his eyes, her face kindling into transcendent beauty as she faintly smiled and slowly shook her head, "No," she said, "you are not Maurice—not my Maurice. I am to be his wife, and he leves me, No!—he is dead, he is hurt—he is here in—oh! I don't know—I can't find him," and dropping her clasped hands and lowing her head, she whispered: "He loves me—me loves me." Then stepping suddenly back, she threw her hands to her head, and gazing at him with her great tawny eyes. "Maurice! see screamed: "Maurice! save me!" and as she tottered forward in a faint, he caught her in his arms.

Tenderly they took her from that place.

"Maurice! save me!" and as she tottered forward in a faint, he caught her in his arms.

Tenderly they took her from that place of the dead, and carefully they nursed her; but the shock had been too severe, and as the days passed away she sank lower and lower, until at last the end came.

It was not until then that she became conscious. She knew that she was dying and bade them all farewell; though she had no fear of death she wept, for it was so hard to leave that newly found happlness in which she had lived but a few hours.

Late in the afternoon, as the last golden rays of the setting sun fell in through the open window and across her bed, she asked Stanton to take her in his arms. He gently raised her to his breast, where she rested quietly for a few moments, and then whispered: "Maurice, darling, I am dying-kies me, sweetheart."

He bent and pressed his lips to hers.

"Once again, Maurice, my darling," she said, "Riss me once arain—the last—the very last time—forever—Maurice—in heaven—my husband."

Her head fell back on his arm, and her sweet brown eyes, which never more would look on anything this side of heaven, rested on his face, as she passed to eternal peace down into the Valley of the Shadow—George Warren Stealey in the Argonaut.

How Bank of England Notes Are Printed.

McClure's Magazins: The notes are printed in a long and narrow printing room, in which a dozen machines of similar construction are in full action. Their denominations vary from 5 to 1,000, the largest note now printed. They sost about two-thirds of a cent cach. A single impression completes the note, specially numbered, dated, and signed by the cashler. The notes are delivered in pairs, sild upon a small table at the back of the press, where an employe stands to examine each one, and see that it is correctly numbered and perfectly printed. The numbers run backward, so that each bundle of 16,000 lie in their natural order when they are taken away. Thus the two notes on each sheet are numbered, say 67,108 and 77,168, and the next pair are 67,107 and 77,167. The bundles are cul in two by an ordinary cutter, and it thus happens that every Bank of England note has three rough edges and one clean one. Great reliance, as a check upon counterfeiting, is placed upon the paper itself, the engraving, as compared with the American standard, being less elaborate. The paper, specially made from pure linen rags, is strangely thin and remarkably tough. It has a pseculiar shade of whiteness impossible to describe, and is printed in indelible ink of a special manufacture. The paper is made by a secret process at a special mill, which, time out of mind, has been the property of the Portal family. The note today is practically the same as it ever has been, and its apparent simplicity offers a great temptation to counterfeiters out of employment.
